Whistleblowers expose federal health agencies' concealment of COVID vaccine injuries

- Sen. Ron Johnson alleges federal health agencies concealed COVID-19 vaccine injury data, calling it the "greatest government scandal" of his lifetime.
- VAERS data showed 21,000 reported deaths linked to COVID vaccines, compared to an average of 280 annually for all other vaccines combined.
- An FDA analyst identified 25 safety signals including sudden cardiac death and Bell's palsy, but officials allegedly shut down the investigation.
- NIH researchers treated vaccine-injured patients in 2021 while withholding findings from the public, according to Johnson.
- CDC and FDA have blocked publication of studies showing COVID vaccine efficacy, with critics calling it censorship and sabotage.

Years of congressional investigations and Freedom of Information Act requests have uncovered evidence that federal health officials knowingly concealed COVID-19 vaccine injury data from the American public, raising concerns about informed consent and government transparency. Sen. Ron Johnson has accused federal public health agencies of displaying an "appalling" lack of transparency with the American public during the pandemic, depriving them of "the benefit of informed consent."

The VAERS discrepancy: 280 deaths to 21,000

The Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System has long served as the primary mechanism for tracking potential vaccine injuries. Historical data shows an average of 280 deaths reported annually across all vaccines prior to 2021. Following the introduction of COVID-19 injections, that number surged to 21,000 reported deaths worldwide.

Sen. Ron Johnson has pointed to this discrepancy as evidence that federal officials knew about safety problems but chose to obscure them. An FDA analyst who independently applied updated analytical methods identified 25 safety signals, including sudden cardiac death, pulmonary infarction and Bell's palsy. Agency officials allegedly told the analyst to cease the investigation and continued using a flawed algorithm designed to hide safety signals.

NIH's secret treatment of vaccine-injured patients

Within months of the vaccine rollout, NIH researchers began diagnosing and treating patients injured by COVID-19 injections. According to Johnson's findings, these researchers instructed patients to remain silent about the research, claiming they needed to complete studies before sharing information with the medical community.

The NIH did not release the study until 2022, and even then, it was placed on a preprint server without public announcement. Johnson argued this deprived Americans of information needed for informed medical decisions.

"There was no informed consent on these injections," Johnson said, noting that the NIH was treating vaccine-injured patients while the FDA was denying the existence of safety signals.

CDC blocks publication of vaccine efficacy data

In April 2026, the CDC canceled publication of a scientific report showing the COVID-19 vaccine cut emergency department visits and hospitalizations by half during the winter season. The report had cleared the agency's scientific review process before acting CDC Director Jay Bhattacharya delayed it over methodology concerns.

Former CDC official Demetre Daskalakis called the move unprecedented, noting he was unaware of any report that had cleared review and been scheduled for publication in the agency's flagship journal being blocked by leadership.

The same methodology had been used for decades to evaluate vaccine effectiveness for respiratory viruses, including a flu vaccine study published just one month prior.

FDA blocks studies supporting vaccine safety

The New York Times reported that FDA officials blocked publication of several studies supporting the safety of COVID-19 and shingles vaccines. The studies, costing millions in public funds, analyzed millions of patient records and found serious side effects to be very rare.

Dr. Aaron S. Kesselheim, a Harvard medical professor who studies FDA regulations, called the request to pull the papers an act of censorship.

“At any other time in history, this would be a major scandal that would lead to congressional hearings and resignations of leadership,” Kesselheim said.

Dr. Jeanne Marrazzo, former high-ranking NIH official, described the withdrawal of papers from publication as a “pretty active act of sabotage.”

Mainstream media silence and the fight for transparency

Johnson has struggled to bring these findings to major news networks, arguing that Big Pharma advertising dollars influence media coverage. He noted that pharmaceutical companies spend billions on prescription drug ads, effectively buying media narratives.

The hearings Johnson convened featured testimony from vaccine-injured individuals and researchers questioning vaccine safety, yet received minimal mainstream coverage. Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.) held a press conference before one hearing urging the public not to watch.

Johnson argued that the same officials who championed the COVID-19 response are reluctant to revisit decisions that may have caused harm.

“Do you want to admit that something you approved, something you pushed on people, killed them or permanently disabled them?” Johnson asked.

A crisis of trust demands accountability

The evidence uncovered through years of oversight efforts paints a troubling picture of federal health agencies prioritizing narrative over transparency. From suppressed safety signals to blocked efficacy studies and secret treatment of vaccine-injured patients, the pattern suggests a systemic failure of the institutions Americans trust to protect public health.

For those who value informed consent and government accountability, these revelations demand continued scrutiny. The question remains whether Congress, the courts and the public will demand the transparency that has been denied for too long. As Johnson noted, the same officials who championed the COVID-19 response have little incentive to admit mistakes that may have caused death or permanent disability.

The fight for transparency continues, with FOIA requests, congressional hearings and independent investigations serving as the primary tools for uncovering the truth that federal agencies have allegedly worked to conceal.
